

Rewilding Apennines is an initiative focused on restoring the unique wild nature of the Central Apennine mountains of Italy.

In close cooperation with Rewilding Europe, Rewilding Apennines works to promote coexistence between local communities and wildlife and support the development of sustainable nature-based enterprises.

With a wide range of experience and expertise, the Rewilding Apennines team manages practical rewilding and field monitoring, national and international relations with other nature conservation organisations, communications and educational programmes, and the development of nature-based enterprises and fundraising, as well as directly engaging with local communities to promote rewilding.

The Central Apennines rewilding area is characterised by "coexistence corridors". Connecting protected areas, these allow the safe movement of wildlife and support the comeback of wild nature.

The endangered Marsican brown bear, a unique subspecies, is an icon of the Central Apennines. Much of the work of the Rewilding Apennines team focuses on this keystone species, with efforts to promote coexistence in corridors around the Abruzzo, Lazio and Molise National Park supporting population expansion.

The Bear Fund was established to finance conservation for the Marsican brown bear. Everyone - businesses, organisations and private citizens - can contribute. Support us:
